

The US Appeals court ruled that the FDA is not a physician to advise doctors or patients on how to treat patients. The FDA, it turns out, enjoys sovereign immunity for misinformation. This is a most bizarre law because it is expected that the scientists appointed to work for the FDA should be highly qualified and should be subjected to the same laws governing any doctor or scientist. Any doctor or scientist, who is guilty of deliberately issuing false information, like the FDA scientists did on Ivermectin, should be immediately stripped of his/her registration. The scientists working for regulatory authorities or for any company are not holy cows that they should not be held accountable to the law or public.

The FDA's callous tweet, "you'll not horses" is an utterly disgusting tweet that had the highest viewership in its history. The FDA staff gloated about the popularity of this heinous post, which is an absolute shame.

Other health authorities in the world need to take heed of the comments by the appellate judges that regulatory authorities like the FDA have no jurisdiction over doctors in how to treat their patients.

This is particularly true when it comes to repurposed drugs.

I sincerely hope that this ruling will serve as a wake up call to all other regulatory authorities in the world, medical and hospital boards, medical doctors, who have blindly listened or adhered to the advice of regulatory authorities like FDA,AAPHRA, TGA, SAPHRA. Doctors have an inherent right to use their discretion on how to treat a patient, especially during an emergency, as enshrined in the Helsinki declaration.

Quite clearly, during Covid, all these regulatory authorities have lost the respect of the general public and, I am sure, a vast number of medical professionals around the world for going beyond their bounds of authority during the plandemic.

All of these institutions must be fully investigated for interfering with the rights of doctors on how to practice medicine; their scientists should be investigated for conflict of interest and dismissed immediately, if found guilty.

Dr Rapiti

Cape Town

3/09/23